Two New Fertilizer Facilities to Address Supply Issues

Kansas Ag Connection - 09/30/2008

With its new Stabilized Nitrogen Center and St. Louis Urea Center, Agrotain International has built a bridge, of sorts, to international fertilizer markets. The two new facilities represent the largest inland urea import terminal and the first phase-modifying urea manufacturing plant in the United States.

Agrotain International and its parent, Lange-Stegmann Company, built the facilities to meet the growing demand for imported urea and the agribusiness world is paying attention. Mike Stegmann, President of Lange-Stegmann Company, says what drove the more than $20 million investment in the two facilities was a combination of skyrocketing demand and a strong history of partnership with their customers. "The new Urea Center will allow our customers to use the facility as part of their own supply networks and provide affordable access to urea fertilizer from around the world," explains Stegmann. "Our Stabilized Nitrogen Center, on the other hand, will help improve the efficiency of nitrogen from urea in this time of record-breaking demand, when growers need the most from every ounce of their fertilizer investment."

Because they are strategically located on a section of the Mississippi River that is lock- and ice-free, both facilities ensure year-round access to and from the country's agricultural heartland by road, rail and river transport. The Urea Center has a massive storage capacity of 63,000 tons with the ability to turn over its inventory four times a month. The Stabilized Nitrogen Center implements a one-of-a-kind process of phase modification that takes the basic nitrogen commodity and transforms it into an enhanced efficiency nitrogen source.
